Excerpt: . given you to drink, continued Dubert, contained a soporific powder; which made it easy for us to convey you, without your knowledge, into. the great hall of the monastery, where our grand operations were to commence. I was the sepulchral voice, said one of the young men, advancing a few steps; I spoke through a trumpet; and hope I alarmed you properly. -- Indeed, cried Mr. Dob, transported with pleasure, you rivalled Mons. Dupont himself! -- And 7, cried a little archlooking wag, was the light which wandered about the cloisters. I tied a lantern to my back; I gamboled among the pillars; and, when I turned my face towards you, the light disappeared. -- Several of these gentlemen, continued Dubert, acted as gi oatiers, sigkers, and shades; opening and shutting doors as occasion required, and sometimes hiding behind them. On reaching the cell of the monk, you found the citizen whom I now present to you, who had, for some time, recited the same prayer, in order that you might be sure to catch some words which should inflame your imagination. When he ended, he bestowed some hard strokes upon a bladder filled with wind, which was hidden under the altar. -- And I, cried Mr. Dob, was-so tenderhearted as to pity the reverend father, thinking that at every stroke his breast bone must give way! By the bye, how did you contrive so as for me to find my hands and...
